This one-day program presents information on the definition, roles and functions of families and family members. It reviews research on how families cope with crisis and presents intervention strategies for each stage in the recovery process. It also details the stages for communities that experience large-scale disasters and the role of the comprehensive stress support team during and following these events. One segment of the program explores the impact of depression and suicide on families and identifies significant symptoms that indicate a referral is advisable.

Communications, conflict resolution and problem solving techniques are presented from the perspective of assisting families during periods of crisis.

This program is both didactic and experiential, lecture and activity based. Students are expected to participate and demonstrate the skills they have learned.
